Senator Machen was shaking hands with his friends at the hotels and club last night. He had what might be termed a strenuous day, for he was engaged in the preparation of the Writ of mandamus to save two proposed amendments to the Constitution, which he handled with conspicuous ability at the last session of the Legislature, and which were threatened with destruction because of an error in spreading them upon the minutes. The Alexan dria lawyer came here from the meeting of the bar association. On Thursday he read a remarkably strong paper on the divorce question, in which took the ground that early marriage is one of the principal causes for the increase in divorce statistics.

The Bridgeport Telegram party, bound for the exposition, had a merry time at the Richmond Hotel last night. The visitors from Connecticut spent the greater part of the day visiting the points of interest about the city, and naturally, some of them were anxious to turn in early and rest. "I wish I could come here and live in this fins old city of hills," said a young woman, more impressed with the charms of the city than the others. All of us have read of Virginia, its quaint customs, its romance and its cavaliers and I must say that the people here are more considerate of strangers than in any city I have ever visited. We have seen the monuments, the Capito, the historic residences, but we could not visit all in the short space of one rushing day. I don't think the visit to the exposition would have been complete without a side trip to Richmond."
